There is nothing of which we are more sure than of that we see—yet there is nothing in which we are more easily deceived. Any one would decide in a moment that the left hand figure enclosing a dog is the smaller of the two in the picture—but it isn't. Both of these are exactly the same size as measurement will prove. Why do we think that one is larger than the other? Because the top and bottom lines of the left hand figure run towards each other on the right and this makes the figure seem smaller than the one next
